Annaliese Ludenhausen loves her robots. More than any man she's ever met. Sometimes, maybe even more than her family. (Shhh. Don't tell.) And now Annaliese is faced with the biggest professional opportunity of her life. She has three days to find the bug in a game-changing robot before it's presented to her high-ups. Nail the presentation, and she nails the biggest promotion of her life. A big step in a career that she's comparing to her dad's--the Nobel Prize winner. Three days at her quiet beach cottage by the sea is all she needs to find the bugger. It helps that it's November and the tourists are gone and it's supposed to rain all weekend. It's the perfect setting for Annaliese to embrace her inner hermit and fix the code of her wonky robot. But when it rains, it pours. Her hippy dippy mother and sister shove their way into her house. A neighborhood dog is purposely terrorizing her. And the neighbor next door is being a jerk. Matt Stone is the country's number one quarterback, and he's having a huge party. This weekend. Annaliese can't control her mom and sister, nature, or the neighborhood Cujo, but she tries to reason with Matt Stone. With studies. With kindness. With compromise. Even with a morning serenade. But Matt has his own problems, and he's not going to budge with doing what he can to distract himself. Not because he doesn't like his neighbor. Because he does, he really does. She might actually end up being his favorite distraction of them all.
